Emphasis was placed upon infantry being able to fight its way forward independently of artillery support as a battle developed. At its heart was the belief that the advantages of different weapon types could be brought to bear on the enemy as and when needed. Consequently, the formations, preparation and training practised for the Battle of Arras were to be different to those used during attacks the previous year. Image is authors own CCBYNCSA In simple terms, the attack was to be led forward by bomb and rifle sections, with the rifle grenade and Lewis gun sections following close behind. Upon contact with the enemy, the rifles and the bombers were to seek out the enemy flank and attack with fire, bayonet and bomb. The rifle grenadiers and Lewis gun team were to attempt to suppress the enemy, allowing the other sections to press home their attack. In order to encourage these developments, training regimes were to be based upon the following requirements All ranks must be taught that their aim and object is to come to close quarters with the enemy as quickly as possible so as to be able to use the bayonet. This must become a second nature. True soldierly spirit must be built up in sections and platoons. Each section should consider itself the best section in the platoon, and each platoon the best in the battalion. Such contests were geared towards the development of weapon skills outlined in SS143, but also inter unit rivalry and a higher level of general fitness. Here are the activities in a competition organised by 112 Brigade in March 1917 In conjunction with effective preparations, efficient staff work, and overwhelming artillery support, Instructions for the Training of Platoons for Offensive Action 1917 provided a simple tactical blueprint that would play a part in the BEF's victories in 1918. I curate and design exhibitions including several First World War Centenary projects.

Until 2011, I worked at Banbury Museum and was a trustee of the Battlefields Trust working on HLF projects. In 2009, I had published Lancashires Forgotten Heroes a history of the 8th East Lancashire Regiment in the Great War. I completed an MA Distinction in Museum Studies at Leicester University in 2011. The total number of FMs, however, would be reduced to 50, covering core concepts and the FMs would be limited to a main body text of no more than 200 pages. All remaining knowledge would be transitioned to a new lowerlevel series of publications, called Army Techniques Publications ATPs. Site maintained by John Pike. This includes the cleaning and handling of their weapon as well as the courses they had to undertake. It includes drill for individuals, companies and then the machine gun sections of the battalion. It includes all aspects of the Division, including the infantry battalions, the artillery and the machine gun battalions. It covers many aspects of how the infantry operated towards the end of the 1920s. It incorporated the latest lessons on mobility and the armaments that were in service. It covers the characteristics and qualities expected of a section leader at that start of the Second World War, as well as the organisation of the infantry battalion and the basic tactics of the section, including patrols, attacks, defence and messages, reports and orders. It also cover the individual skills and knowledge of the infantryman, such as camouflage and concealment and how to dig a slit trench. The formations for patrols and setpiece attacks by the platoon and section are explained and there are diagrams throughout. It includes a full training schedule and all of the lesson detail is included.
